3. In order to avoid the unusually high attrition rate experienced during in-processing and the first week of officer candidate training, it is imperative that commanders as well as screening boards include a thorough explanation of the physical, mental and emotional stresses encountered while undergoing this training. Whenever possible a recent graduate of the Reserve Component OCS course should be utilized to assist the applicant by conducting a review of the program to apprise him of the true nature of the course.

4. The constantly increasing complexity of service in the Army National Guard imposes a continuing demand for a high degree of motivation, determination and competence on the part of its leadership. It is therefore important that only the most qualified guardsmen be selected to attend these courses.
